An ideal vacation

There's not really one spot I'd want to put above the others. I suppose, if I had to pick, I would go for a vacation to Iceland. It's a place I still don't know much about, and that's honestly a shame. I heard it's really rocky there, and the weather, too, seems just right for me.

A dream destination to visit

I want to go to Deimos, the outer moon of Mars. Realistically, that's never going to happen, and most would call me insane for wanting to travel there anyway, but for some odd reason (I can't even explain to myself), it draws me in. Besides, it's got a wonderful view, and who would ever pass on one of those?

The US

Once a land of opportunity, nowadays a death-pit for anyone unlucky enough to wander there. The incessant conservative, militarist and narcissist rhetoric leaking from every corner of their society has seriously dragged down the country's standing to the point where travel warnings were issued by the German government. At this point, although I have considered it, I don't see myself going to the USA ever; but you can't fault me for that, considering how I'd probably be burned at the stake at the earliest convenience there, anyway.

The upcoming school year

Going into this year my mood would be best described as somewhat hopeful. Despite the usual shortcomings of the school experience, I'm mostly enthusiastic in light of upcoming material. That is to say, if it actually holds up to my expectations of what topics would be dealt with in the upper grades. To add to that, private reasons are driving me up a particularly steep slope I'm attempting to overcome this year, and I'm looking forward to doing better than before.

Explain the reasoning behind the missing object

The object in question: A teddy bear

Typically, teddy bears are associated with a lot of sentimental value. Oftentimes they are family heirlooms, making them even more valuable from an emotional perspective. To whoever it belongs to, it can be a really important possessions.

Write a one-sentence-summary of the short story

Someone teaches their friend what being falsely accused feels like.
